Find Light in Love and Gratitude

By Mary Murphy, M.Ed., LPC

After the death of your loved one, the anticipation of these first holidays can be filled with a combination of dread, anxiety or numbness. Many intentions pass through your mind and the realization sets in—your loved one will not be home for the holidays. And they will be missed. The season is as laden with memories as a Thanksgiving table is with food.

There may be some relief for you if—in your grief—you can turn your heart to love, acceptance, and gratitude. You might say, “Right. And why don’t I lift my car over my head while I’m at it?” It isn’t easy, but know there is a window of possibility to relieve the dread, anxiety, and numbness.

“Pain is inevitable. Suffering is optional.” There is truth in this saying, and it can be a mindful message for grieving. We grieve those we love. It hurts. How much you suffer, though, is optional.

How do you get through the hurt and the holidays?

First of all, let’s remove the big push. Words have power, so let’s change the words around and set a positive intention. Ask yourself, “How can I experience love, peace, and gratitude (fill in your own intentions), while grieving, during these special days?”

Don’t brush your grief and sadness aside. Take care of those feelings. Have a special candle devoted to your loved ones, possibly with pictures and music, then spend time reflecting on the love they gave you and the love you gave them—the treasure you now carry. Through the tears, a smile might emerge.

When you’re suffering, pay attention to what you love or are grateful for in that moment. Begin a daily habit of writing three expressions of gratitude and three loves at the end of each day. It might be as simple as: Gratitude: 1. I woke up; 2. My feet are working; 3. I can smile. Loves: 1. My friend Sarah; 2. Shimmering snow; 3. Cream in my coffee.

Have an attitude of gratitude. The practice of gratitude (and love) is supported by research.<sup>1</sup> Among other benefits, an attitude of gratitude helps one better cope with stress, boosts the immune system, improves mental alertness and positive

FROM THE EDITOR

“I thought I was doing much better. The pain had subsided; I could laugh again. I was beginning to spend time with friends. Then, I had to face my first big holiday without him. I felt the similar effects of grief wash over me and it was just like the healing process had never begun.”

The holiday season is often overwhelming. We are bombarded with the jingle jangle, the advertisements, the decorated stores and doctor's offices. Everything is in your face, constantly reminding you of the joyful holidays that loom ahead.

What's a grieving person to do? The physical absence of your beloved is palpable and your grief washes over you like it was just yesterday that your loved one died.

Many bereaved have felt the three C's were helpful. Communicate, commemorate, and compromise. One couple was grieving the death of an adult child and it was the first Christmas. The wife did not want any decorations, let alone a tree. The husband wanted a tree. They talked about it and decided to have a tree in a different room than usual. As they hung the decorations, they reminisced about their child and added an ornament to honor her. They compromised and commemorated. Another family wanted their sister, who was recently widowed, to attend the holiday dinner. She didn't know if she could or if she wanted to. She let her siblings know her feelings and only decided at the very last minute to attend, leaving her car in the street for a quick get-away.

There's no right or wrong way to grieve during the holiday season. Each person needs to do what feels right in their grief process. Communicate your feelings and let others support you on your journey.

Wishing you peace in the new year.

The Holiday Present Nobody Wants...

Have you ever been so excited to open up your beautifully wrapped holiday presents that you beg and beg your parents to let you open up one gift before you normally would? You only ask for one because you know the answer will be “no” to any more than that. You do everything you can to convince your parents to allow you to at least have a peek, shake it or size it up to the items on your wish list. Nonetheless, all your hard-fought efforts fall short and you are destined to wait until your family’s holiday gift exchange occurs.

The day has arrived! You finally have that present you’ve been begging for, sitting on your lap. The anticipation is mounting and you can hardly stand another minute of patience. As soon as you’re given permission to unwrap the gift, you rip off the ribbon, tear into the paper, flip open the box, and stare at it. This thing—it isn’t what you hoped for. It’s not only the wrong color or size, but it was never on any wish list or advertised on any commercial. You can’t believe it—you just opened grief!?

What in the world are you supposed to do with this? You start to think: “Am I supposed to say ‘thank you’ to someone? Is it something I wear? Do I play with it? Can it do my chores for me? Maybe I’ll just give it to my sibling, or re-gift it next year? Perhaps I opened the wrong box?...” Questions and thoughts continue to swirl in your head, and you realize others have opened similar packages. They don’t look exactly the same, the colors and size are different, but there’s something similar between all of them. The feelings of confusion, frustration, disappointment, sadness or anger are all things you notice and identify with when you see someone else open their gift. The only thing you can really say is “I’m sorry,” or listen to them as they experience their own range of emotions. It’s definitely not a present anyone wants, but there’s something about it that actually is a gift.

Grief can be a gift when it:

Allows you to empathize with others who have experienced loss in their life.

Increases your compassion toward others.

Helps you remember what your loved one meant to you.

Reminds you that you are not alone – others have loss in their life too.

Keeps you focused on the value of the present moment.

Everyone who opens their own box of grief is able to understand, if even just a little bit, what others have experienced. There is a shared humanity in knowing we all grieve and can find gifts in our grief.

New Year Resolutions

By Diane Snyder Cowan, MA, MT-BC, CHPCA

Many people think about making resolutions in the New Year. Lose weight, eat better, exercise more and spend less are common examples of resolutions long forgotten by the first of February. For those grieving a death, resolutions may be the farthest thing from the mind. Perhaps your resolution might be adjusting to the absence of your loved one. Adjusting to the loss includes making meaning of the changes that have happened as a result of the death. Here are some considerations:

- 1 Be honest with your feelings. Others might expect you to be "over it" at three or six months post death, but there is no calendar for grief. Find a place, a way, or a person with whom you can express your grief feelings.

- 2 Do something that feels good. This can be spending time with people you like, finding a hobby that provides an outlet for your creative energy, or an escape from the day-to-day. Doing something often builds self-esteem through a sense of accomplishment. Take a walk or hike, make art, journal, listen to music, be with others.

- 5 | Continue your loved one's legacy. Think about what was important to the person who died. There are ways you can transform your grief into a legacy of love. Share stories about your beloved with younger generations. Contribute to a charity or attend an event in honor of your special person. Bake or cook those special recipes. Listen to their favorite music. ▶▶

As you search to find meaning in loss and adjust to changes in your life, you may begin to make some sense of what has happened. You may find a bridge that connects the past with the future in a way that makes sense to you.

- 3 Talk about your deceased loved one. Say his or her name out loud. Find ways to honor or include him or her at holidays and special occasions. Create a remembrance project such as a scrapbook, photo album or a collection of recipes or letters.

- four Give yourself permission to change. Life is different now. Consider what you have lost, what you have left and what you are going to do now. What is becoming of the person you used to be and who are you now? What lessons or self-discoveries have you learned?

feelings. I am reminded of a friend whose husband was diagnosed with a terminal illness. The hope they had for one another was to do their best in that moment. When times were tough, one of them would begin to recite gratitude. "We have clean water running from our tap," one would say. "The autumn leaves are spectacular this year!" would say the other. "We have love in our home right now." And the list would go on until they had found peace in love and gratitude.

If you choose to attend holiday gatherings, notice who is there, not who is absent. Though the thoughts and loneliness will creep in, turn toward love and gratitude. Sometimes we are so involved with grief we become blind to the beauty and love around us. When your eyes mist, turn toward a person you love. Find comfort, step into the moment and open your heart and your eyes to the love that faces you.

BOOK REVIEW

By Vicki Jackson, MSW, LISW-S

The Empty Chair Handling Grief on Holidays and Special Occasions

Authors Susan J. Zonnebelt-Smeenge, a registered nurse and licensed clinical psychologist, and Robert C. DeVries, an ordained minister and seminary professor wrote this book specifically about grief and the holidays offering hope for bereaved individuals in need of support during these times. This book is intended for the newly bereaved however, it can be utilized regardless of time.

Using their professional and personal experiences and beliefs, they have integrated the five chapters into three parts. The first part encourages personal self-reflection of loss from the very beginning to a new and hopeful future. The second part contains specific suggestions from a mental health perspective on managing grief during holidays and special occasions. The third part contains spiritual meditations and prayer on loss, mainly from a Christian perspective.

One can read all three parts of each chapter or pick one chapter that is most helpful at any given time. The chapters are short, easy to read, and contain an ongoing theme of hope and peace on one's journey through grief.
